Highest Mountain and Deepest Bay presents the culmination of Kiki Ando's work over the last 10 years. Spanning ceramics, textiles and animation, this exhibition draws inspiration from the artist's upbringing in Japan and life in Australia and wider abroad, where she established her artistic career. Ando's work invites us into a playful world evoked by personal childhood experiences and a deep-rooted connection to nature.

Over the years, Kiki Ando's artistic career has taken various forms. Often distinguished for its unique DIY sensibility, Ando's approach slips comfortably between traditional and unconventional creative modes. By merging different media and styles together in contemporary spaces, Ando brings a new narrative to traditional artforms.

We would like to express our gratitude to the artist, as well as the curator, Rafaela Pandolfini who has made this exhibition possible. We also thank Ando, Pandolfini and Dr Ricarda Bigolin for offering insightful contributions for this publication.

Highest Mountain and Deepest Bay reflects Kiki Ando's trans-cultural experience between Australia and Japan. With its mission to promote cultural exchange between the two countries, The Japan Foundation, Sydney is pleased to present this catalogue in lieu of the physical exhibition, which regretfully couldn't open to the public due to unforeseen circumstances led by a COVID-19 outbreak.

We hope Australian audiences enjoy Ando's world of creativity and imagination by viewing this online publication and associated public programs.

CURATOR'S INTRODUCTION

By Rafaela Pandolfini

So, when I came to write science-fiction novels, I came lugging this great heavy sack of stuff...full of beginnings without ends, of initiations, of losses, transformations and translations, and far more tricks than conflicts, far fewer triumphs than snares and delusions; full of spaceships that get stuck, missions that fail, and people who don't understand. I said it was hard to make a gripping tale of how we wrested the wild oats from their husks, I didn't say it was impossible.

Ursula Le Guin, The Carrier Bag Theory of Fiction

Highest Mountain and Deepest Bay is an online catalogue of Kiki Ando's work. The catalogue and associated public program reflect Kiki's artistic archive and her imaginative world, spanning hand-built earthenware and terracotta ceramics, wearable paper art, animation and live performance.

Kiki left Japan more than 20 years ago to travel and continue her art practice. She has travelled broadly and more recently spent a lot of time in South-East Asia, working on performance and costume. She currently lives in Melbourne. Highest Mountain and Deepest Bay is the first comprehensive show of Kiki's artistic career.

Nature is one of the artist's greatest inspirations. Kiki grew up in Numazu City, Eastern Shizuoka Prefecture, near Mt. Fuji, the highest mountain in Japan and Suruga Bay, the country's deepest bay. The mountains and ocean surrounding her home influenced Kiki's love of nature.

When Kiki was a child, she spent a lot of time playing alone in the rice fields, but she was also often very unwell. Kiki recalls lying on a futon with high fevers and spending long weeks at home with nothing to do but read and draw; botanical picture books were her favourite. Another formative experience for Kiki was a school project on Hayao Miyazaki's 1984 film Nausicaä of the Valley of the Wind. Her enduring impression of the film was one of shock at the brutal tension between the natural and human worlds.

A great source of inspiration also forged in Kiki's childhood, was the creative spirit of her mother Hiroko, whose zōri (Japanese sandals) and patchwork quilted Kimonos feature in this exhibition. When Kiki was unwell as a child, Hiroko avoided Western medicine and looked to traditional Japanese remedies and alternative diets to help heal her. Hiroko studied the macrobiotic diet and skilfully taught herself macrobiotic cooking.

I remember how creative okaasan [mum] was around the home. She was always making things, mastering one craft and moving on to the next thing. Patchwork quilts, paper clay, Japanese paper collage, sewing, clothes-making, she has been weaving cane and rattan for a long time. I remember watching her experimenting especially with food; it was a very normal practice at home to be constantly making. So, creativity and making are natural for me.¹

Kiki also loves the work of artist Yayoi Kusama.

Kusama's work has a pop aesthetic and is very emotional. From the titles in her artworks, for example Spirits of the Pumpkins Descended into the Heavens and My Eternal Soul, it feels like spirituality is very important to her. I think Yayoi Kusama can see and feel other worlds and tell us important messages through her artwork. I love the way she works across fashion and performance. She lives as one with her art and affects me and my work.²

Across all elements of Kiki's expansive artmaking, we can see hints of traditional Japanese artistic practices. These include Boro, which are mended or re-woven textiles and Kamiko, hand-made paper clothing. She is also inspired by Butoh, a unique form of expressive movement that crosses the boundaries between dance and theatre. Kiki creates with the Japanese traditional practices as a starting point, freely crossing borders between mediums.

Kiki studied at Melbourne Fashion School and after graduating, ran her own label 'I Love My Kunt' and organised runway shows at the Foundry warehouse where she lived. Kiki makes costumes for film, artists and her own performances. Kiki's garments are inspired by Boro fashion, a Japanese textile practice known for mending and patching together used materials.

Kiki is influenced by Japanese fashion designers, especially the inimitable Rei Kawakubo of Comme Des Garçons and her Fall 2013/14 and 2015/16 runway shows. John Waters' description of Rei Kawakubo's garments and approach exemplifies this connection in all but the financial aspects: "she specialises in clothes that are torn, crooked, permanently wrinkled, ill-fitting and expensive."³

As Kiki became uncomfortable with the fashion world's environmentally unsustainable practices and exhausted by its unattainable financial rigours, she began making wearable artworks from found materials and paper. This move has enabled Kiki the freedom to experiment with shapes and textures and convey ideas she is more preoccupied with.

When I was in Bangkok for the Buffalo Fields Arts Festival, I found a big pile of paper at the side of the road. I brought the paper back to the hotel and made a costume for the dance. The paper costume was covered in dry leaves which was perfect because I was performing under a big old tree. When I came across that paper, I felt like it had illuminated itself to me to prevent itself from ending up in the rubbish. When we look at things from a different angle, we can discover new types of beauty. You might have thought that it was trash, but I want to forget about reality when I look at it and find a different angle to see new stories. Discovering objects in a new light can become an important story.⁴

Kiki's paper garments in Highest Mountain and Deepest Bay styled on functional and traditional wares, include the works Lightweight paper jacket, fruit salad pleated skirt and Y's chic hat, Classic white paper jacket and luxury real estate ad paper skirt, Pink camellia fragrant incense kimono and Samurai kraft paper sleeved kimono, envelop and love letter necklace, post office-like chic hat. In these garments, Kiki used a range of recycled materials, including sections of newspapers in various languages from countries she has travelled, incense wrappers and 'Who Gives A Crap' toilet roll paper. She has created beautifully tailored Kimono, pants, jackets, hats, skirts and even a broom.

Kiki has recently expanded her practice into video. Highest Mountain and Deepest Bay includes a new animation made in collaboration with animator Lee Friend Roberts, sound artist Ai Yamamoto and photographer

Rafaela Pandolfini, entitled Rare deep sea fish develop my unique personality. In it, Kiki performs playfully in a selection of her upcycled paper costumes also exhibited in the video. Across a scrolling set the artist has painted, she treads gently in her own world where she exists harmoniously with nature and her ceramic creatures and vessels.

Kiki's ceramics captured in Highest Mountain and Deepest Bay are a nine-year archive of works made between 2011 to 2021 at a community centre in the north-west Melbourne suburb of Flemington.

I make ceramics at a studio in Flemington. It's a community centre run by the local council. It is affordable, so I have been going there for a long time. There are no classes, I can do whatever I want, so I experiment in many ways. The people who go there come from all different backgrounds. I feel relaxed with minorities. I had an art studio in Collingwood for a while, but I felt a bit like an outsider there.⁵

Kiki's ceramics, much like the other streams of her practice, draw many parallels with Los Angeles-based Magdalena Suarez Frimkess (b. 1929 Caracas). "She's not an outsider artist, but she is outside of the ceramics tradition,"⁶ said curator Karina Gulbran about self-taught Suarez Frimkess, whose hand built ceramic figures and vessels are painted with an eclectic range of imagery from religious motifs and floral landscapes to pop figures like Betty Boop. Despite five decades of consistent making, Suarez Frimkess has only gained recognition over the past 10 years. Artist and curator Ricky Swallow is a great admirer of Suarez Frimkess and describes the staunch belief in her process that again, in many ways, echoes Kiki's approach: "She has her own way of doing things that is totally free from any agenda beyond satisfying her own standards."⁷

In 2015, Kiki went back to Japan for a few months for a series of one-on-one classes with ceramicist Mr Ishikawa at the Ashitaka Art Village. Kiki hand builds her ceramics because she finds this approach enjoyable, she likes the possibility of creating unlimited shapes. In Highest Mountain and Deepest Bay, Kiki's ceramics include earthenware fashion accessories such as [hair] Brush 1 and 2, with black tipped bristles which could also be squirming worms. This catalogue also features her Hook series, in which objects are glazed in a beautiful array of colours including muted pale pinks, textured greens and mottled orange tones. Kiki has also created a series of forest creatures, including White Creatures, a group of translucent white pots with ears and blue eyes looking about at all angles. She also takes on the beloved native koala, glazed royal shiny blue entitled Koala Pot Head.

Kiki has a wonderful way with colour. The glazes drip and layer in a way that seems unintentional, but the colour combinations and repetitions reveal a precision with layering glazes. Looking at the ceramics in this catalogue, you can see that the finishes in the objects, which have been made over nearly 10 years—return to the same muddy hues, such as her purples, a clotted cream tone and dirty yellows.

The most prominent shapes Kiki has made over the years of her ceramic practice are an array of differently shaped vessels: Walking box, Walking plate, Pink odd pot, Odd walking cup and so on.

In her essay, The Carrier Bag Theory of Fiction, Ursula Le Guin argues that the useful vessel contains a new and crucial part of history that has been overshadowed by sensational stories and spectacles that have been misleading the placement of value: “We’ve heard it, we’ve all heard all about all the sticks and spears and swords, the things to bash and poke and hit with, the long, hard things, but we have not heard about the thing to put things in, the container for the thing contained. That is a new story. That is news.”⁸ In Kiki’s story she offers the audience a broad range of vessels that hold infinite possibilities. There are vessels for her mother’s favourite food dishes or native Australian flowers or dry grasses, there are even vessels that can walk straight off the shelf into Kiki’s imagination.

There is a practicality to the objects Kiki creates, however they do not fit together how you would imagine, or function as you would expect. Some of her ceramic vessels appear like they are only just holding it together. The paper garments are made from sellotaped recycled materials retrieved from the recycling bin in whatever city she is working in. They are continually repaired and remodelled, the tears, rips and scrunches are ‘the style’. Kiki isn’t imitating function and practicality; Highest Mountain and Deepest Bay is a collection of works that reflect her uninhibited imagination, created with unique style formed over years and influenced by Japanese tradition, her mother Hiroko’s craft and Kiki’s own need to create beautiful and useful things.

This isn't a gripping tale, this exhibition is merely an excerpt of an arts practice and livelihood that is in constant continuum, a practice that is gentle, enduring and practical (newsworthy). Much like Ursula Le Guin's description of her narrative style, "its purpose is neither resolution nor stasis but continuing process."⁹

ART IS DANCING ART IS LAUGHING

by Kiki Ando

I talked to the birds last week
They said it's snowing in the North
They say it's all white up there
This week I talked to the fish
They were opening and closing their gasping mouths
Although they were not interested in me too much
They seemed a little lonely, as if they needed some company

Yesterday I met a human being
She said they started a war out West, and many people are dying from disease in the East
She seemed happy that things were so peaceful here
Today I met with aliens
They said that they were planning to invade the Earth, but there was no real expression on their faces, so I couldn't tell what they were actually thinking
The Camellia fallen from the tree and scattered on the ground still look fresh
Do all living things share the same struggle before their lives wither away?

Art laughs, Art dances
My body is selfish
My heart is selfish too
I cried as I pleased and danced as I pleased
Art made me laugh and dance
Art was clumsy, but it was just honest
I tried to find an answer, everything floating out like a flood,
Turning into sounds, and I found myself singing

FAKE NEWS, FASHION MATERIALS AND EMOTIONS

Kiki Ando, Art is Dancing Art is Laughing, exhibition text 2021

Fake emotions are not really comparable to fake news. The latter being false or hoax information presented as veritable news, while the former understood as problems associated with presenting true feelings and attachments. Words can fail to capture the complex emotions found in the gaps between thinking of the feeling and actually feeling it. In the works of Kiki Ando, in a blissfully fake-news-free world, reclaimed newsprint melds memories, garment forms and values of emotions.

The above excerpt from a poem by Kiki captures the emotional frame of nostalgia, the recollections of feelings associated with connections to our bodies, each other and other 'things' in this universe. The imprecise allocation of emotions or attachment to forms is part of Kiki's practice wandering between mediums and forms. This intuitive and iterative nature of Kiki's practice is embroiled in somewhat floating emotions that cultural theorist Sianne Ngai describes as "unusually knotted or condensed interpretations of predicaments".¹ In Kiki's wearables, newspapers laden with messages from foreign shores are fashioned into ensembles of many messages to be read, where emotions feel displaced and wide-eyed in artful configurations.

There are many examples of newspaper print fashion: novelty ensembles of garments created from newspapers, or newspaper print made glamorous in silk confections. Newsprint paper is likely to soon be an outmoded printed material of the industrial era. With circulation numbers of hard copy newspapers dwindling, there is likely to come a time someday (soon) when we won't have the material resources (trees, wood pulp, water) to print newspaper, or have use for it as a conduit for various forms of communication, exchanges and messages.

Jumping decades back, newspaper used to be a readily available valueless material we would reach for to pad, protect, and prop other objects or insulate roofs for extra warmth. Yellowing and faded newspaper always reminds me of rice paper, its translucency growing with time, the material's resilience fading. When more readily available, newspaper was the material used to wrap breakables, stuff and protect objects when moving house, or obfuscate forms for 'pass the parcel' games, where gifts were wrapped in layers of paper to give the impression of something monumental inside. I've heard stories of my father, who, as a young semi-pro cyclist in Italy in the 1960s, used newspaper and cardboard to insulate his cycling jerseys. He would tear and fold sheets of paper, arranging it around his chest and stuffing it between his body and wool jersey, with structure provided by corrugated cardboard. In that time, these materials were in abundance, as newspapers were the primary news media. Kiki's resourceful use of newspaper and cardboard reminds me of these memories, layered and made complex by my own emotional history.

In the era of fake news, episodic and misleading digital ranks and tweets, it is intriguing to think of the circulation of newspapers. Whilst perhaps outside the fake news conglomerates, newspapers worldwide have always been sites for propaganda and publicising by political regimes. Today, you might find newspapers in old houses, behind plaster, tiles and grotty carpet, a news fragment from another time emerging in a renovation rescue, a former important announcement, personal ad or death notice now subsidiary liner, filler material of impermanent value and available for reclaimed use.

With a 'make do' approach, Kiki treats newspaper using a variety of fashion and material techniques. In Lightweight paper jacket, fruit sale pleated skirt and Y's chic hat, folds and pleats add structure and volume to silhouettes, while layers accumulate in different ways around the body. These techniques are matched not to textiles, the materials that usually go with them, but to newsprint, the flimsy and inexpensive paper that fades rapidly and deteriorates with exposure to air, antithetical to ‘archival’ paper. If we think of newsprint as a material to convey news and its temporal qualities, newspaper becomes transformed in Kiki’s work. In Marx’s terms, newsprint’s ‘use value’² is radically shifted from economical print media to objet d’art. No longer discarded wind-blown pages on street sidewalks, Kiki’s garments use fashion techniques to change how newspapers and various other throwaway paper ephemera are ‘read’. In his book Fashion and Materialism, scholar Ulrich Lehmann talks about this in fashion processes:

The transformation of the object coincides necessarily with the transformation of use value into surplus value, and this process appears as transitory and ephemeral, despite its very real socio-economic consequences which can be observed in historical time.³

The economic newsprint and other post-consumer waste paper materials take on an entirely different reading when performed on the moving body. In the Pink camellia fragrant incense kimono ensemble, narrow sheets of packaging and instruction leaflet are pieced together patchwork-style, thin paper buckling with increased structure and form. The candy pink usurps the iconic Japanese garment archetype and a lurid and subverted beauty emerges. In Kiki’s words, this is the importance of the message that comes from the material. Responding to materials means treating them as they are rather than trying to change them. The garments are formed by working with incense paper’s rectangular shape, and with reference to the traditional zero waste method of the Kimono, which pieces together sometimes small rectangles of precious, worn and repaired textiles. The garment’s value is transcended with throwaway packaging and paper, once precious materials swapped for something of lesser monetary value—and yet, somehow these seem weirdly more emotional or emotive. The ‘reading’ here in Pink camellia reminds me of fleeting youth, Nag Champa incense, the aromas of shabby share houses, cigarette smoke and bad stir fries.

Embodied “ugly emotions”, or those that give a “general state of obstructed agency” or “ignoble feelings like envy (of the disempowered for the powerful) or paranoia”, as noted by Ngau,¹ resonate with the chopped gestures and movements of Butoh. Kiki’s ceramics, such as Trophy Vase, with its crude finger indentation and maker’s marks, also speak to the way her practice is highly intuitive regardless of learned craft or technique— affectively capturing “the emotional contours of life during increasingly precarious times”.⁴ These affects seem produced in incessant iterations of making, capturing emotions that words fail to grasp, and the endless riddles of art and life practices. These materials, from traditionally used clay and Kimono silks, to post-consumer waste materials, stand in for emotions, however ugly or sublime.

ARTIST

Kiki Ando

Kiki Ando was born in Numazu City, Japan and works across textile, ceramics, performance and design. In 2003 Ando moved from Japan to Melbourne, where she resides today. Ando graduated from the Melbourne School of Fashion while living and working at the art studio and gallery, The Foundry. In 2007, Ando moved to Berlin to explore textiles and music. While in Berlin, Ando also worked collaboratively with electronic pop band Private Posh Club. Ando returned to Melbourne in 2009 and in 2012, went on to design costumes for dance performance DasSHOKU SHAKE!, which toured Australia and Japan. In 2015, Ando worked as co-director and puppet and prop designer on the film project Studio 3 in East Timor. Ando continues to explore multi-disciplinary artistic forms, with a particular focus on ceramics, costume design and Butoh performance. She performs regularly in Australia, Thailand, Indonesia and Malaysia.

CURATOR

Rafaela Pandolfini

Rafaela Pandolfini is a photographer, artist and works in the curatorial. From 2009, Pandolfini photographed clubs and dancefloors across Gadigal Land/Sydney. She continues to photograph dance and performance work for many artists and institutions. Pandolfini's independent curatorial work includes Inside, co-curated with Stella Rosa McDonald, Session Vessels and An Unintended Consequence (of labour) organised with Ainslie Templeton, Cosmopolitan organised with Jana Hawkins-Andersen and Myths & Facts for WestSpace and PHOTO2021. Pandolfini is a PhD candidate with the Contemporary Art and Social Transformation (CAST) research group at RMIT University and holds an honorary position as an industry fellow at UTS Design Innovation Research Centre.

AUTHOR

Dr Ricarda Bigolin

Dr Ricarda Bigolin is a designer, educator and researcher who is currently Associate Dean of Fashion and Textiles at RMIT University. Her research questions the social, cultural, ethical and political contexts of fashion production and consumption. Bigolin runs critical fashion practice D&K, which produces garments, performances, exhibitions, texts and films that show in leading art and design museums, galleries, publications and universities globally. Bigolin's work uses fashion languages and materials to interrogate the broader influence and everyday impact of fashion.
